A Youthful Essay

By Shomit Sirohi

First, I introduce the theme of the essay. A simple youthful argument on say travel we are all following. Travel is then a habit, most people love travelling in cheap hotels or cheap amounts. Now I learn a simple truth, that travelling is also tourism. From this I derive a set of arguments – travel, travelling, tourism, and even spiritual situations, and spiritual company perhaps, and all its divine aspects, like seeing the Parthenon and walking in a beach. I mean such divine life to be seen and seen more and understood. Can you believe this event.

Now I argue most people prefer Vienna Circle, the habit of following lecturing, or perhaps a long philosophical conversation about travel as “doing” which means “making” and so in fact an Erleibnis is there. Like following a story of travel ideas.

“The man gets off the plane, and walks into Frankfurt, and then takes a taxi and enjoys the winter and even smokes a cigarette and then walks into a café and drinks coffee, and finally meets a person in the university and spends three days in Frankfurt and then walks to a cathedral in America the next week. It means then of course to sense the Sistine Chapel. Life is that Terrence Mallick type argument to be lived. Perhaps Vienna Circle prefers admiring a philosophical conversation on this first. Can it be that phenomenology is so much about also Husserl, a daily diary kept in line with travelling a simple diary that says it all.”
